

Indiana's Premier Assisted Living Community Receives Deficiency Free Survey From Indiana State Department of Health

Indianapolis, IN -- Autumn Park Assisted Living Community obtained a "Deficiency-Free Survey" from the Indiana State Department of Health (ISDH) in August 2013.

ISDH is responsible for ensuring that assisted living communities and nursing homes comply with mandatory state regulations. The inspections, called surveys, are conducted on a no-notice basis and consist of a checklist of areas and categories to examine including: medication administration, resident care plans, medical records, kitchen sanitation, staff competencies, dietary needs and the overall environment and safety of the home. Ultimately, the survey's purpose is to evaluate the fitness and adequacy of the community, its equipment, staff, policies and procedures and finances; quality of life and care received by the residents; and ensure the community is operating according to the ISDH's highest standards.

During the inspection, the State's survey team evaluated all aspects of Autumn Park and assessed compliance with hundreds of specific state and federal standards. James Kesler, Autumn Park's Executive Director, states "we are very proud of this outstanding achievement. We put our residents and their care first and this perfect survey confirms we are doing an exceptional job." Mr. Kesler encourages prospective families who tour Autumn Park and other communities to ask for state survey results. ISDH mandates that state surveys must be displayed prominently in a public area and copies provided upon request. "We tell families to compare survey results of all communities they consider. When a family needs care for their loved one, the state survey is an important tool in understanding how residences are rated and which communities are performing on a higher level," says Mr. Kesler.
